However, I can say that you may want to go find a panel from a junkyard Del Sol and put it on your car, cause that would save you some work, and I bet you could paint it yourself.

The drains I am talking about are at the junction of the outside rear window and the plastic trim panel between the window and the trunk lid. Right under the corner of the triangle shaped trim panel on each side of the trunk/rear window, there is a drain hole that can get filled with tree droppings etc...

areas with tin from a scrap yard hood, It takes patience to form the cut and form the panels precisely. I left one side intact and made templates to keep the original body lines. But now after a years work it is all metal again.

The rear quarter panel is the most common part that needs body work because rust will appear on the rear wheel openings. This is also where many collisions, minor scratches, and dents occur from backing accidents. Depending on the area and the damage, replacing the rear quarter panel can either be relatively simple or very expensive.

Sand down the body, and apply a solvent to clean the surface. Spray on a rust resistant primer, and wait for it to dry. Then spray on the paint. Wait a day for it to dry, and then remove the tape and plastic. If everything went right, the new quarter panel should be seamless with the rest of the car.

Getting entire quarter panel sections to replace a little rot is WAY overkill. Over the last few years, I have seen multiple people do their own rust repair in their own garage. I'm not saying it'd be easy or simple, but buying 2 new quarter panels is going to set you back 10 times more than if you just repaired your car.
